Taking the fear out of illnesses caused by modern life

More and more people suffer from illnesses caused by a modern lifestyle. Cancer, heart attacks, high blood pressure and diabetes are just a few examples of these often deadly diseases. The overweight are particularly vulnerable to these illnesses and there can be no doubt that our diet has a decisive influence on their development and progression.

Although almost everybody knows what a healthy diet looks like, only very few people actually manage to stick to such a diet successfully. But does it really matter what we eat, or is it possible that the times when we eat are at least of equal importance?

Quite obviously, yes! Research over a period of almost 80 years has shown that the concept of intermittent fasting presented in this book is – irrespective of what you eat – not only a particularly effective way of losing weight, it is also a veritable panacea in the fight against the most serious illnesses caused by our modern way of life.
